Transparency will help, not harm, campuses

As Peter Hans pointed out, confidence in higher education has been declining in part because the public perceives professors and administrators as placing personal interests or ideological causes above the institution's proper priorities of preparing students to shoulder their professional, familial, and civic responsibilities. Transparency will help restore that public confidence.

Dear HBCU Boards: The Leadership Crisis Is You

Accrediting bodies like Southern Association of Colleges and Schools Commission on Colleges (SACSCOC), whose accreditation region is home to the majority of the nation's HBCUs, have remained silent about setting policy or standards to force more accountability for boards despite increasing standards requirements for institutional operational elements. It's time. In this era where more national attention is being given to building infrastructure at HBCUs, to celebrating achievements and contributions of HBCU, and to acknowledging their historical and future legacies, who is here to hold the boards accountable for their adverse impacts on our institutions and their leaders making the changes our institution's need?
